Beyond the Virus!

Those of us blessed with the good fortune to survive this storm are obligated to remember five-year-old Skylar Herbert, the daughter of a policewoman and fireman.

And we have a duty to honor the memories of more than 200,000 others whose lives were snatched from them, and from those whom they loved.

We must become better people, concerned not simply with our own lives, but with others near and distant. We must resolve to be more just, and to live with greater purpose and decency!

This plague has delivered a potent message to the world, and its people.

It has asked do we continue as we are, or shall we pursue newness of spirit, of substance and of will?

Once we emerge from our shelters we must not live as we did before this calamity.

We must strive for newness, and clarity in all that we do. We must remake ourselves, our communities and our world.

We must always remember those who succumbed such as Skylar, who wanted to become a physician.

In our daily routines we must consider the importance of healing, and bringing comfort and aid to others!

If we do we shall be better prepared for the next plague that finds us, or finds those that live after we have departed.

We are now obligated to making meaningful and spiritual adjustments that will shield us from the tumultuous madness of the next plague.

We must be bold in our search for solutions that will enable us to survive, and extend our way of life.

We must be loving in all that we do, elevating our concern for the common good as surviving the plague demands that of all people!

“ We must elevate our concern for the common good!
